

New treatment for MS

The Ottawa Citizen March 29, 2010

It has been several months since CTV's W5 program popularized the liberation treatment for multiple sclerosis. Dr. Paolo Zamboni of Italy has been to North America several times and his work debated, peer reviewed and discussed by the neurological and medical communities ad nauseum.

Almost six months later, and 80 years since the theory of chronic cerebral spinal venous insufficiency (CCSVI) was first proposed, Canadians are spending as much as $20,000 to be treated in other countries like the U.S., India and Poland. Why?

Our medical establishment and provincial health-care plans cannot put Canadians' health ahead of policies, dogma and priorities.

Hundreds of procedures have been done globally with resounding success. In Canada, we still cannot even be tested under our provincial health plans, let alone be treated.

Shame on Canada. Stephen Harper should show some leadership. The 70,000 Canadians affected by MS will remember this at election time and will be making our points on May 5 on Parliament Hill.

Andrew Katz,

Ottawa

© Copyright (c) The Ottawa Citizen